

The Personal Emergencies Fund provides grants to clergy, church workers and their immediate families to help them pay for critical emergency medical treatment which they cannot afford and which will enable them to return to service in their ministry.

In 1979, the late Archbishop Donald Coggan, former Archbishop of Canterbury, saw the need for a fund in the Anglican Communion to give financial assistance to clergy and members of their families facing personal medical emergencies. He arranged for a sum of money to be invested, from which the interest could be allocated towards the cost of such needs, in the hope that other charities, churches and individuals would add to the annual amount available by grants and donations.

Since then, the Personal emergencies Fund (PEF) has been able to help hundreds of Anglican clergy and their families as they have faced medical bills that have been well beyond their means. Lives and ministries have been spared and prolonged because a former Archbishop of Canterbury responded to the heart rendering stories of people who had no hope of medical treatment because of lack of finances.

The Fund has been able to assist in many different medical emergencies, supporting individuals through major surgery, cancer, recovery from car accidents, diabetes, heart problems and kidney problems to name a few. Full guidelines of how grants are administered are available to download.

Why the Personal Emergencies Fund?

The Anglican Communion spans the globe. It includes many countries with little or no government provision for health care and, if there is private treatment, it is frequently way beyond the means of most people.

The Fund provides help for urgent or critical medical needs of bishops, clergy, lay-workers, and their families or dependants and where possible, medical treatment is provided in the applicant's own country.

The PEF is administered by the Anglican Communion Fund. Grant applications are prayerfully considered by a committee comprising:

Rev Canon Nick Sagovsky (Chair)

Ms Marjorie Bannister

Dr David Child

Mr Guy Heald

Rev Ben Cahill-Nicholls

Rev Barry Nichols

The Secretary General of the Anglican Communion
