Founded in 1197, Lambeth Palace garden covers just over 10 acres and is one of the oldest gardens in England.

What grows in the garden?

The extraordinary micro-climate of central London means we can be adventurous.

The garden has many species native to England, as well as plants from all over the world to reflect the breadth and scope of the Anglican Communion.

Trees, shrubs, perennials and annuals from Europe mix happily with a wide range of plants from the Americas, Africa, Asia and Australasia.

What grows in the garden?

The extraordinary micro-climate of central London with the Thames so close by means that we can be as adventurous as possible, and help all kinds of plants to thrive and flourish.

We have many species native to England, but we also like to include plants from all over the world to reflect the breadth and scope of the Anglican Communion.

Diversity is always a good thing in a garden. Trees, shrubs, perennials and annuals from Europe mix happily with a wide range of plants from the Americas, Africa, Asia and Australasia.

Who looks after the garden?

We have two experienced full-time gardeners. They are supported by a team of volunteers who help with weeding, pruning and planting as well as collecting leaves in the autumn.

Volunteers join us here for all kinds of reasons. Some come to gain practical skills and experience to enhance their studies, while others have a particular affinity for the garden itself.

Many enjoy the peace and contemplative quiet that the garden offers from the busy world outside.

Greener Gardening

We look after the garden organically without chemical pesticides or weed killers. This helps encourage natural predators.

Lacewings and ladybirds help keep aphid numbers down, while numerous small birds feed on the leaf miners that harm some of the trees.

Hundreds of toads have made the garden their home - they are especially partial to slugs.

We create different habitats, such as longer grass in some areas, or discreet piles of decaying logs, to encourage more wild creatures. Our aim is to bring nature back into the middle of the city's hustle and bustle.
